As a young author 'who was yet to find a public he was cautious about immediately identifying himself with a work that he himself regarded as shocking' (Ziff x) because it tried 'to show that environment is a tremendous thing [...] and frequently shapes lives regardless' (Sorrentino 82). That Maggie is one of the major works to criticize the environment of late 19th century New York City becomes obvious when the reader notices that the protagonist Maggie does neither occur in the first, nor in the last chapter of the novella. Looking more closely at the word 'environment' itself one can observe that the term is ambiguous. On the surface the term seems to describe the external living conditions, namely where and under...
