Purchasers can download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1881. Excerpt: . . . Dr. Robinson's Paper. TWO opinions, it appears to me, in regard to laryngeal disease as a complication or intercurrent affection of pulmonary phthisis, prevail amongst general practitioners of medicine: the first is that this disease is generally the same; the second, that it is usually, if not always, incurable. There are other erroneous notions of minor importance which we encounter even in the writings of professed specialists in throat affections, and to which I shall direct attention as I proceed. The objects of this paper are: first, to mention the varieties of laryngeal difficulty I have encountered in the care of phthisical patients; second, to describe some of the symptoms and pathology of each of these somewhat in detail; third, to point out a few signs of differential diagnosis and prognosis; and, finally, to dwell upon certain indications of a rational and judicious treatment. Dysphonia, or aphonia, in pulmonary consumption, in so far as it may depend upon interference with the integrity of the vocal function, will be explained by: 1, a purely functional affection of the vocal cords; 2, a catarrhal inflammation of the laryngeal mucous membrane; 3, a degeneration of the intrinsic laryngeal muscles, or an interstitial deposit between the primary muscular fascicles; 4, incomplete or complete paralysis of one or other true vocal cord; 5, ankylosis, or luxation of the crico-arytenoid articulation; 6, infiltration and ulceration of different portions of the intralaryngeal structures, accompanied or not with a papillary development of...
