Excerpt: . lbre, the maidens were walking in the King s garden, gathering roses of the white and red, and telling each other about this and that that was said at the ball, and about such and such that was worn; there, Maid-alone, seated by the ashy hearth, was eating her luncheon of scraps and listening to the Ratcatcher complain against the servants for saying that he was letting the rats eat up all the tallow that they had for candles; and yonder, in her lady s chamber, Dame Dale sat listening to what her daughters, Berrybright and Buttercup, were saying about the strange maiden who was the last to come into the King s ball. She came late and she sped away before the end to start people talking about her, said Buttercup. And her slippers! said Berry-bright. Was it noticed, I wonder, that her slippers were bronzecolored? That one should come to the ball not wearing grass-green slippers was an affront to the Chamberlain who had arranged everything to bring out the gold on the ground. Nobody seemed to notice that she spoiled the whole ball. Everything was going very agreeably before she came in, said Buttercup. And the King s son would have asked me to distribute the citrons and pomegranates: that is one thing I.am sure of. You need not be so sure of that, sister, said Berry-bright. I saw him look from the citrons and pomegranates to my white hands,...
