Excerpt: . . . reasons, insect-proof, tin cases have been procured for the reception of specimens of this kind. They are of sufficient size to receive the herbarium sheets and so constructed that, when closed, no insect can enter them. Also a large, air-tight, tin box has been procured, in which such specimens may be disinfected by remaining a day or two in the fumes of carbon bisulfkl, before they are placed in the permanent receptacles. While copious rains are, as a rule, necessary for the production of a large crop of fleshy fungi, there are apparently exceptions to this rule. In some parts of the state where the rainfall of the summer has been deficient, the fall rains, though not abundant, have been sufficient to produce an unusual abundance of the common mushroom and the smooth lepiota. The plentiful crop of these two mushrooms about Albany and Utica has been specially noticeable, and has been a repetition on a small scale of the crop of 1896. The Albany market has been well supplied with the common mushroom collected in pastures and fields, the farmers having recognized them as a marketable commodity and brought them to the city in baskets and crates and disposed of them as they would small fruits. The price obtained was generally 10c a quart. When the smooth lepiota, which closely resembles it in size, habits and edible qualities, has become as well known as the common mushroom, it will add much more to the available supply of food of this...
