When he came to himself, which he did almost instantly, the bear s body had been pulled off from him, and El Estranjero, white and anxious, knelt beside him, mopping with his handkerchief his chest, which was bleeding from the scratches of the bear s claws. Philip sat up and looked about him. He smiled a little shakily as he rose to his feet. He was unhurt, for the scratches were only superficial. Well, comrade, he said, as he spurned the bear with his foot, we won t have to eat venison for lunch even if the cub did spill my berries. Where s my knapsack? Oh, there it is! I think, hereafter, Senor, I will carry my gun on my back, as you do. I think it would be wise, said Estranjero. Philip picked up his fallen hat and came and gazed down upon El Estranjero, who was examining, the huge carcass. Senor, he said, this is the second time you have saved my life, and you have doubled the debt I owe you. You owe me nothing, El Estranjero returned with a frank smile. I have only done what you would have done for me or another under the same circumstances. I happened to be the one nearest you both times, and accidents will happen in a life like this. You d better go back to camp now...
